In 1960, Adolph Coors III, the heir to the Coors Brewing Company fortune, was found dead in his bed. He had been shot in the head, and his death was ruled a suicide.

But many people believe that Coors was murdered, and that the investigation into his death was a cover-up. The Coors family has always maintained that Coors killed himself, but there are a number of suspicious circumstances surrounding his death that have led to speculation that he was killed by someone else.

One of the most suspicious circumstances is the fact that Coors was shot in the head with a gun that was not his own. The gun was a .38 caliber revolver, and Coors was right-handed. However, the gun was found in his left hand, and there was no evidence that he had ever fired a gun before.

Another suspicious circumstance is the fact that Coors's body was found in his bed, but there was no blood on the sheets or the pillow. This suggests that Coors was killed somewhere else and then moved to his bed.

There are also a number of witnesses who have come forward to say that they saw Coors being followed by a group of men in the days leading up to his death. These witnesses say that the men were threatening Coors, and that they believe that Coors was killed by them.

The investigation into Coors's death was handled by the Golden Police Department, which is a small police force that is not known for its competence. The investigation was closed within a few weeks, and the police concluded that Coors had killed himself.

However, there are a number of unanswered questions about Coors's death. Why was he shot in the head with a gun that was not his own? Why was his body found in his bed, but there was no blood on the sheets or the pillow? Who were the men who were following him in the days leading up to his death?

These questions have never been answered, and they continue to haunt the Coors family and the people of Golden, Colorado. The murder of Adolph Coors III is one of the most mysterious and unsolved murders in American history.

The Coors Family

The Coors family is one of the wealthiest and most powerful families in America. They have been brewing beer in Golden, Colorado since 1873, and their Coors Brewing Company is one of the largest and most successful breweries in the world.

The Coors family has a long history of philanthropy and civic involvement. They have donated millions of dollars to local charities and have played a major role in the development of Golden, Colorado.

However, the Coors family has also been involved in a number of controversies. In the 1970s, the family was accused of using illegal surveillance techniques to spy on its employees and critics. In the 1990s, the family was involved in a bitter labor dispute with the union representing its workers.

The Murder of Adolph Coors III

The murder of Adolph Coors III in 1960 was a major shock to the Coors family and the people of Golden, Colorado. Coors was a popular and well-respected figure in the community, and his death was a senseless tragedy.
