The African diaspora in Australia has a long and complex history. The first Africans arrived in Australia in the 1800s, as slaves and indentured laborers. In the early 20th century, a small number of African students and professionals began to settle in Australia.

After World War II, the number of Africans in Australia increased significantly. Many African countries gained independence during this period, and a number of Africans came to Australia to study or work.

In recent years, the number of African refugees and asylum seekers coming to Australia has increased. These refugees and asylum seekers have fled war, persecution, and poverty in their home countries.
