The Investigation

The Mueller investigation was launched in May 2017, after President Donald Trump fired FBI Director James Comey. Comey had been leading the FBI's investigation into Russian interference in the 2016 election, and his firing raised concerns that Trump was trying to obstruct the investigation.

The Mueller investigation was led by Robert Mueller, a former FBI director. Mueller was given a broad mandate to investigate Russian interference in the election, and he was authorized to subpoena witnesses and documents.

The Mueller investigation lasted for nearly two years, and it involved a team of dozens of prosecutors and investigators. The investigation examined a wide range of evidence, including witness testimony, emails, and other documents.

The Findings

The Mueller Report concludes that Russia interfered in the 2016 presidential election in a "sweeping and systematic fashion." The report finds that Russia used a variety of methods to interfere in the election, including hacking into Democratic computer systems, spreading disinformation on social media, and contacting Trump campaign associates.

The report also finds that the Trump campaign "welcomed" the Russian interference, and that Trump campaign associates had "repeated contacts" with Russian officials. However, the report does not find that Trump or his campaign associates conspired with Russia to interfere in the election.

The Obstruction of Justice Investigation

In addition to investigating Russian interference in the election, the Mueller investigation also examined whether Trump obstructed justice. Obstruction of justice is a crime that occurs when someone interferes with a criminal investigation.

The Mueller Report concludes that Trump did not "conspire or coordinate" with Russia to interfere in the election. However, the report does find that Trump took a number of actions that could be considered obstruction of justice.

The report cites several instances in which Trump tried to interfere with the investigation, including when he fired Comey and when he asked White House Counsel Don McGahn to fire Mueller. The report also finds that Trump made false statements about his involvement in the Russian interference.
