A Call to the Wild

In the early 20th century, as civilization encroached upon the pristine wilderness of Alaska, a group of extraordinary men heeded the call to adventure. Led by the enigmatic Charles Sheldon, a naturalist and conservationist, they set out to document the unspoiled beauty of the region. Among them were renowned photographers, such as Robert F. Griggs and Martin Johnson, who captured breathtaking images of Alaska's towering mountains, majestic glaciers, and abundant wildlife.

Into the Uncharted

Their journey took them through treacherous terrain, from the icy shores of the Bering Sea to the untamed interior of the Brooks Range. They navigated treacherous rivers, climbed towering cliffs, and endured extreme weather conditions that tested the limits of their physical and mental resilience. Along the way, they encountered grizzly bears, wolves, and other formidable animals, proving that the wilderness remained a harsh and unforgiving mistress.

The Frontiersmen

The men who dared to explore Alaska's untamed frontiers were a diverse cast of characters. Among them was Paul Rainey, a wealthy sportsman and adventurer who organized the Arctic Biological Expedition in 1911. John Burroughs, the renowned American naturalist, joined one of Sheldon's expeditions and chronicled his experiences in his book "Alaska: Its Scenery and Wildlife."
